"All businesses need images," said Shutterstock's founder and CEO Jon Oringer, "and these milestones represent the power of Shutterstock's two-sided marketplace and the ability of our 40,000 talented contributors to help the world tell stories."

Shutterstock maintains a rigorous review process when considering new artists and content for the library. "Shutterstock's vetting process ensures our collection is not only one of the largest of its kind, but also of exceptional quality," said VP of Content Scott Braut. "Licensing 300 million images is a testament to the remarkable depth, breadth and quality of Shutterstock's library," Braut added.

Indicative of emerging design trends, which celebrate abstract patterns and neon colors, the 25-millionth image added to Shutterstock's collection is a vector illustration of a cat on a black background by a Russian artist named Natalia Koroleva.

The 300 millionth image downloaded was a macro close-up photograph of leaves from long-time Shutterstock contributor Carlos Caetano from Portugal.

Shutterstock has paid out more than $150 million to its contributors around the world in the nine years since its founding. The company also began previewing Offset, a new brand featuring a high-end collection of extraordinary licensable images.
