"We've learned a lot about the benefits of a global, crowdsourced marketplace model from Shutterstock, and applied that knowledge to online learning," said Shutterstock's Founder and CEO Jon Oringer. "The idea evolved from our existing customer and contributor communities and quickly expanded to include all digital professionals," he added. "Creatives and technology professionals are always looking to improve their skills, and Skillfeed offers high-quality training alongside an all-access membership model."

"Skillfeed is a natural extension for Shutterstock since we already serve an active, paying community of more than 750,000 professionals who view us as a trusted, creative resource," said Oringer. "We are excited to offer yet another way to help digital communicators succeed in their work."

At launch, Skillfeed features more than 10,000 videos from over 100 instructors. "We're working with top-notch instructors from around the world and curating tutorials ranging from the creative arts, including graphic design, video and photo editing, to professional skills such as Microsoft Excel and web development," said Vice President and Skillfeed General Manager David Fraga.

Designed for brushing up on existing skills or developing extensive new ones, Skillfeed offers two types of courses:

- Comprehensive Courses - Videos of 20 minutes or more, designed to develop in-depth professional skills, such as HTML or Adobe InDesign.
- Skill Snacks - Short videos you can watch on your lunch break to pick up new tips and techniques on a range of topics from Photoshop to video editing.

To celebrate the launch, Skillfeed is offering users a free 1-week trial. Subscriptions for unlimited video access start at only $19 per month.
